Patterns of Welcome

CULTURE & SOURCES • context, care & extension

Why this place, why this lesson?

Louisiana neighborhoods mark occasions in many ways, through family meals, street gatherings, festivals, and public signs. New Orleans Vietnamese communities celebrate Tết; other communities gather through neighborhood, faith, and family traditions.

Broader perspectives

Explore multiple examples without treating a culture as one decorative pattern. Students invent personal patterns based on welcome, not copies of religious or culturally restricted motifs.

A culturally responsible teaching protocol

Name the makers — Identify artists, communities and cultural bearers by name where sourced and relevant.

Differentiate study from appropriation — Students may analyze techniques and contexts without copying sacred, ceremonial, or culturally restricted imagery.

Avoid a single story — Offer multiple identities, geographies and points of view, including everyday life rather than only festivals.

Give students agency — Students can choose a different relevant subject and retain the same artistic learning goal.

Check the record — Distinguish primary testimony, museum interpretation, observation and speculation; cite the actual source.

Ask permission — Obtain permissions for interviews, photographs, student work displays and public sharing when required.

Lesson-specific caution

Do not assign students to imitate Vietnamese, Indigenous or Black masking designs. Use community examples to discuss purpose and participation, then create original student-owned symbols.

Student reference log

Who created the image, object, quote or source?

When and where did the work or event occur?

What does the source actually say or show?

Which elements are my own interpretation?

Do I have permission to reuse the material?

Extension for advanced or returning artists

Compare how repeating symbols communicate differently at a school entrance, gallery doorway, or community center.

About the instructional design

This lesson is a free original adaptation of the teacher-provided 2026 Artistic Investigations document. Its ten-stage inquiry structure and reflective goal-setting are preserved. The accompanying author resource, Fostering Artistic Growth: A Teacher's Guide to Instilling Studio Habits of Mind, informs the studio-habit emphasis. The full text of that published book was not supplied or reproduced.

The eight Studio Habits of Mind originate with Project Zero / Studio Thinking research. This independent resource does not imply endorsement by the book publisher, Louisiana Department of Education, cultural organizations, or Studio Thinking.
